The new law concerning the graduated driver's license is one of great debate. The advantages of this law; however, nearly outweigh the disadvantages. There are many reasons teens should not be allowed to receive their full license until they are seventeen. Teenagers are, as a whole, pretty immature and giving them a license to drive with no restrictions is like giving them an license to kill.

There are many wrecks and deaths each day that are caused by immature teenagers at the wheel. The graduated license would limit the accident and death toll of teenagers because it encourages responsibility and rewards good behavior. If teenagers are allowed to drive around at all hours of the night, you can expect them to go find trouble somewhere. The graduated license keeps teens from getting into potentially dangerous situations by restricting the hours at which a teenager can drive.

Another great aspect of this new system is that the teenagers don't mind that their driving is restricted. It doesn't bother them because they know if they are patient and wait one year they will be allowed to drive around whenever and wherever they like. This law is producing more patient and respectable children who have self-control and want to do what is right. The teenagers know that by staying off of the streets late at night they are protecting themselves as well as the other drivers on the road.

Probably the most important aspect of this law is that it limits the number of people allowed to ride with a teenager. Teens are most at risk in the vehicle when there are two or more people in the car. When teens get together they try things that one would not do if he or she was alone. This poor behavior around other teens is the most conclusive reason to have this law. Teenagers simply cannot be trusted with the welfare of other teenagers. They also cannot be trusted to behave correctly in the driver's seat when they are surrounded by other teenagers.

So, as you can see, there are many positive things which will result as effects of this law. This law, if enforced, will save many teenagers' lives as well as others who could have potentially been killed by a teen's immaturity. I cannot see any disadvantages, but even if there are some, the advantages strongly outweigh them. This law saves lives, ~~the children~~ it doesn't bother those which it affects, and it will keep teens out of trouble. If that isn't those aren't valid enough reasons for support, you will not find any.
